As stated therein, the limited number of telephones should be made available to the public in order that we may get extra revenue in respect of the large capital expenditure incurred from borrowed funds, and telephones should be provided for Government officers and particularly for residences only in cases of absolute necessity in the interests of Government, and that in respect of telephones provided for residences, at least half the recurring charges should be recovered from the occupants, as there is no way of preventing their use for private purposes. If a telephone for the residence of the Government Advocate is considered to be absolutely necessary in the public interests of Government, it may be allowed subject to the condition that half the recurring charges are borne by the officer.
